Community and Economic Development Partnership

Written by: Joe Rowan, Executive Director, Funding Partners featured in the March/April Official Journal of the Colorado Bankers Association

As we emerge from recession, how will the banking industry develop an effective campaign to fend off political accusation and public distrust that might otherwise impede a financial recovery? Are banks ideally positioned to expand the marketplace for financial services to support a broader economic base?

Known to some, but overlooked by many, Community Development Financial Institutions (CDFIs) represent an effective vehicle through which both challenges might be addressed.

CDFIs, in general, are unregulated non-profit organizations certified by the U.S. Treasury as a means to expand access to capital and credit to populations and geographic markets underserved by the mainstream financial services industry. These organizations develop and deliver products and services that seek to fill market needs while complimenting the offerings of regulated institutions. For instance, CDFIs are able to operate effectively at smaller scale to establish viability of products or services at larger scale or in conjunction with products offered through a bank partner.

A CDFI may be set up as a community development bank or credit union, a revolving loan fund, or a venture capital pool, though all are market-driven, locally controlled, private-sector organizations. Customers may include consumers, businesses, other non-profit entities, public authorities, or any combination of each. Whether set up as a non-profit or for-profit entity, a CDFI must primarily serve low and moderate income populations or communities.

As the vast majority of CDFIs hold capital of less than $50 million, there is little capacity for such organizations to compete directly with banks. Rather, CDFIs are compelled to devote a substantial portion of their services towards capacity building and technical assistance to the individuals and communities they serve. The key phrase is 'creating more bankable customers'.

Here in Colorado, several CDFIs are delivering tangible benefits to the banking industry through micro-finance, small business lending, housing development and home purchase finance; all targeting low and moderate-income populations. As customers are introduced to the discipline of managing credit and building wealth, they are encouraged to 'graduate' into the mainstream, allowing CDFI capital to go back to work for the next client.

To support this activity, CDFIs derive capital through multiple sources, most significantly banks, though also includes local and federal government, foundations, corporations and other socially-motivated investors.

The CDFI industry in Colorado is well positioned to re-establish a responsible and responsive financial services continuum across our state. We recognize the value proposition inherent to a vibrant economy for all Coloradans and the critical role of a strong banking sector.

difficult to know when it's been updated," said Ruth Lytle-Barnaby, executive director, Poudre Valley Health System Foundation. "This resource is one to which our community members can go at any time and find the most updated data that reflects our kids' health, saving them time and effort."

Kim Sharpe, HCC coordinator, added, "When we released our report last summer, we knew some of its data soon would be obsolete given how quickly statistics change. This new online version of the Snapshot is so exciting, because we can keep it up to date and add new data when it becomes available. We'll work with Snapshot users to make the site as useful to them as possible."

"HCC's Snapshot" data bank is so named because it's a point-in-time picture of how our kids are doing today.

HCC Snapshot: The State of Children and Youth in Larimer County which contains data and statistics in a variety of categories about the health and well-being of Larimer County's residents, birth to 18 years of age, was launched today by the Healthier Communities Coalition of Larimer County (HCC).

"This is a fabulous new resource for our community," said Lise Youngblade, Colorado State University Department of Human Development and Family Studies department head and

State of Children and Youth in Larimer County. However, the online database includes features the report doesn't. In addition to having many ways to search for information and direct links to original data sources, the site highlights local agencies or groups that are addressing specific issues. Additionally, the database will be kept current and expanded to include new categories of information.
